

Pathways to Music: A Structured Music History Course

There is music all around us, every day. We hear it as background for TV dramas and motion pictures, school band play marches at football games, and haunting tones of the pipe organ accompany us as we sing a hymn at church. But there is another kind of music. Music composed just for listening. It isn't written as a background for drama or for studying. It isn't intended to make us want to dance. It's not music to rouse us at a football game, and spur the team on to victory. It isn't an accompaniment to anything. It is this wonderful world of music that we are talking about. Through words, pictures, filmstrips and, most important of all, hearing the music itself, new worlds of exciting sounds will open their secrets before us. These are the pathways to music. One period of music grew out of another, and new forms grew out of old ones. All this happened over a long period of time. Pathways to Music follows the usual plan of grouping composers and their music into period of time but you should understand this is only out of convenience.
